*During the long, hot summer of 1782, General George Washington had a lot on his mind. After the Continental Army's victory at the Battle of Yorktown, the British seemed to be on the verge of surrender, but it hadn't yet happened. The American forces settled into an uneasy wait at their Verplanck's Point, NY, encampment. Meanwhile, Washington had to both impress his French allies so they would continue their support and manage his own troops, who'd grown restless with the long war, harsh conditions, and poor pay. Could the Continental Army hold on?
